

BUBBLING UNDER ICE

The gas methane is made of carbon and hydrogen, and is present in underground reservoirs. Lighter than air, it rises into the atmosphere in the summer from Arctic lakes, such as Lake Baikal in Russia's Siberia region. In the winter, the surface of this lake freezes, trapping methane under it as strings of bubbles.