

POLAR LIGHTS

The Sun emits “solar winds” of high-energy particles that are pulled towards Earth’s North and South Poles by the planet’s magnetic field. These particles collide with the atoms of oxygen and other gases in the atmosphere, producing light displays called auroras.