

SALT FLATS

Hundreds of artificial ponds dot the hillside near the small town of Maras, high in the Andes of Peru. The ponds fill with water from a stream that runs down from the nearby mountains. In the sunshine, the water evaporates, leaving behind a thick salt crust that can be collected. The people of Maras have been gathering salt in this way for at least 500 years.