

tired, or depressed a lot of the time, you may be suffering from postpartum depression, so it's important not to ignore these symptoms. Your doctor will offer support and refer you to mental health experts if needed.

Looking at your lifestyle

Your doctor will advise you on healthy eating and lifestyle measures. If you smoke, you'll be given information and resources to help you stop.

YOUR BABY'S CHECKUP

A pediatrician will want to see your baby at around 4 days, 1 month, and 2 months to do a physical checkup and look at how your baby is growing and developing.

They will perform a similar examination to the newborn checkup (see The first medical checkup). They will examine your baby's hips, spine, eyes, heart, and the pulses at the top of the legs. In boys, it's important to check that the testes are located in the scrotum. This is also a chance to look for subtle problems such as a heart murmur, which can develop after birth. Your baby will be weighed and head circumference measured. The doctor will ask how your baby is feeding and check for signs of jaundice. Your baby's development will be checked too: whether they have head control, is starting to smile, and can focus on an object or face a foot away, and follow a moving object. Your baby should receive some immunizations during these early visits. All these findings will be recorded in a record of your baby's growth and development.
