

Help! I'm pregnant again and my little boy is only 18 months old. How will I cope? Pregnancy can be exhausting, particularly in the first trimester, when your body is adjusting to the new demands placed upon it. Having a toddler to contend with at this time makes it even harder. Most important of all, don't feel guilty about putting your feet up—it's important to take a step back and remember that your most important job right now is “growing” your baby. If there was ever a time to accept offers of help and call in favors from friends and relatives, it is in the coming months and after the new baby is born. Meanwhile, here are some simple things to try:

- Focus on quiet activities to enjoy with your toddler and leave the rough-and- tumble play to someone else.
- Take time to nurture yourself, sleeping when your toddler naps.
- In good weather, sit outside and let your toddler burn off energy.
