

You will be given a scan picture of your baby. Don't be surprised to find yourself looking at it again, and again, and again! It's also a great way to share the news with others.

FOCUS ON PARTNERS

You and your pregnant partner will be looking forward to the first scan, but it is normal to worry that there may be a problem with your baby.

The first scan may seem quite technical since it is used to detect your baby's heartbeat and take some measurements, but it's also very emotional. In reality, the first scan gives you the first look at this new life. It lets you see your baby moving around, with legs kicking and arms flailing, even though those movements can't be felt yet.

Perhaps, as the nonpregnant partner, the biggest shock of the scan is the fact that it confronts you for the first time with the physical evidence that your baby really exists. Your partner is likely to be more used to the idea of pregnancy, because she's carrying the baby, but the scan will make the pregnancy much more real to you, and you may be surprised at how emotional you feel.
