

Some of your usual vitality should begin to return toward the end of the first trimester.

My bra size has gone from an A cup to C cup. Will this increase last forever? The majority of women who have had babies do report a permanent increase in breast size. The effects of estrogen cause fat to be deposited in the breasts and when your milk comes in after the birth your breasts will get bigger, but reduce again once you have stopped breastfeeding.

FEELING BETTER?

By the end of this trimester, many of the early pregnancy symptoms are likely to have passed.

- Nausea may have begun to lessen and it can be a complete relief to wake up in the morning without feeling sick. Your lost appetite will return, and you can stop worrying about whether your baby is being properly nourished, which is often a common concern for women who suffer from morning sickness.
- You won't need to urinate quite so often. This is because your uterus is now moving up the abdominal cavity and therefore is placing less pressure on your bladder.
- The fatigue that you may have felt in these early months is likely to have lifted by now, and you may be sleeping more deeply now that you're relaxing into your pregnancy.

If your sickness hasn't passed yet, don't worry—for some women, it does last longer (see You are 13 weeks exactly).
