YOUR BABY TODAY

This 3-D ultrasound scan clearly demonstrates that the baby's arms and legs are now fully formed and much more in proportion with the trunk. All of the baby's joints are now formed, enabling a full range of movement.

“This is a good time to start telling the important people in your life your exciting news—before they guess for themselves.”

Now that you're in your second trimester and have had your dating scan (see First ultrasound scan), you may want to start telling a wider circle of people that you're pregnant. You can feel confident doing this, knowing that the risk of miscarriage is reduced to no more than 1 percent after the 12th week of pregnancy. Besides this, your belly will begin to show in a few weeks, if it hasn't already, so hiding the pregnancy will become difficult.

If you and your partner have been keeping the pregnancy a secret for the past three months, announcing it will be a huge relief and it can be a positive experience to share your good news with others. However, be prepared for an onslaught of advice and people's tales of their pregnancy and birth experiences!

Sometimes letting others know that you're pregnant can be difficult. Be sensitive to other people's feelings: friends who also want to have a baby, but are having difficulty conceiving, may find it difficult to share your happiness right away. It's preferable to tell these people face to face rather than them hearing it through the grapevine. Even if they don't react positively, and don't want to talk about your pregnancy all the time, give them time to come to terms with it at their own pace. Remember they can be sad for themselves while being happy for you.

SECOND TRIMESTER TESTS

If you have not yet had a screening test for Down syndrome, you will be offered either the combined test or the quadruple test depending on your gestation.

- The combined test can be carried out at between 10 weeks and 14 weeks, and from 14 to 20 weeks the quadruple test is offered.
- You may also want to have the NIPT blood test.
- Screening for other abnormalities is done by ultrasound.
