

the discomforts of early pregnancy. As a result, you may have noticed you're less nauseated and have more of an appetite.

Technically your caloric needs don't increase at this stage of pregnancy, although if you've been very nauseated in the first trimester and not gained weight you may feel hungrier now. Be guided by your doctor and don't restrict your eating, but continue to eat meals and snacks that are nutritious. Snack on a glass of milk and a banana, a handful of dried fruit and nuts, or a slice of toast with peanut butter or cheese.

If you're exercising regularly, you need to allow yourself to have additional energy. After exercising, avoid the sports drinks and opt for a glass of milk—it's hydrating and provides protein, too.