

As you don't eat red meat, which is the best source of iron, you need to make sure you have plenty of iron from plant sources. Eat lots of whole-grain cereals; mycoprotein (Quorn); green vegetables such as kale and spinach; legumes such as lentils, soy, and kidney beans; and dried fruit such as raisins and apricots.

It also means making sure you can absorb as much of the iron as possible by avoiding drinking tea or coffee until at least 30 minutes after eating, and enhancing absorption by having a vitamin C or protein-rich ingredient at the same time. For ease this means drinking your 150 ml daily citrus juice with your meal, or having tomatoes or peppers in a sandwich or salad.

A dressing made with lemon juice—or chopping a kiwi fruit or clementine into a green salad—will help, too.
