

Your uterus is likely to be large enough to give you a noticeably rounded belly.

The placenta is still growing, although not as fast as in earlier weeks. It continues to be a vital supply line for the baby.

The baby's movements are getting more vigorous and you may now be able to feel them.

The sex organs are developing well, both externally and internally. In baby girls, follicles containing immature eggs are already forming in the ovaries.

Your baby is now bigger than the placenta for the first time, and will continue to outgrow it.

At 18 weeks the average crown to rump length is 5.6 in (14.2 cm) and the average weight is 6.7 oz (190 g).
