

On the pads of the fingers the ridged pattern of the baby's fingerprints, his personal badge of identity, is becoming apparent.

The top of your uterus is now level with your belly button.

A little fat has started to cover the baby's body but he still looks very skinny and his head appears too large for his fragile neck.

The eyes make random movements under the still-closed lids.

The ears have moved up from the jawline to their final position on the side of the head; the eyes, too, are now in their final position, and face forward.

At 19 weeks the average crown to rump length is 6 in (15.3 cm) and the average weight is 8.5 oz (240 g).
