

The increased blood supply to the cervix, or inflammation, can produce light bleeding, especially after sexual intercourse.

Heavy bleeding in the second trimester may suggest a problem with your placenta, such as placenta previa.

Or the placenta may separate from the uterus wall causing pain and bleeding, known as a placental abruption. Light bleeding is common and often it is not possible to determine where it has come from. Always notify your doctor if you have any bleeding.