YOUR BABY TODAY

The nose is well defined and in addition to regularly swallowing the amniotic fluid your baby is breathing it in and out through each nostril. Just as adults do, your baby will tend to favor breathing more through one nostril than the other.

“The proportions of your baby’s body are becoming much closer to those of a newborn baby.”

Up until the third month, your baby’s head accounted for almost half of their overall length. Now their head, torso, and legs account for a third each. At birth your baby’s head will still be large in proportion compared to an adult’s, but it will be just a quarter of their overall length.

Still very skinny, your baby is now starting to fill out more as fat reserves continue to be laid down. Until about 14 weeks, most babies are approximately the same size and weight. After this point, genetic and especially environmental forces increasingly come into play, influencing how quickly your baby can grow and whether his full growth potential is eventually reached.

Because babies increasingly vary in size as the pregnancy progresses, ultrasound dating becomes less accurate at determining the due date. The best time to do so is during the first trimester, by ultrasound, measuring from the top of the baby’s head to their bottom (the crown-rump length). The 20-week scan also dates the pregnancy very accurately from the head and abdominal circumferences and the bone measurement in the leg.

If your first scan is at this late stage, it is only possible to estimate roughly the stage of pregnancy and age of the baby. It is never appropriate to change your due date if an earlier, more accurate scan has been performed.

OLD WIVES’ TALES

It is often said that if you’re carrying your baby low, you’re having a boy, if you’re carrying high, then it’s a girl. But the way you carry is probably determined by the tone of your abdominal and uterine muscles and the baby’s position.

According to those “old wives,” there are other physical clues: if you’ve gained weight on your face and it’s round and full, you’re having a girl. If your right breast is larger than your left, it’s a boy—and if your partner gains weight, you’re “definitely” having a girl!
