

belt directly under your belly (see How to wear a seat belt), to ensure that there is no danger to your baby if you are involved in an accident.

Traveling by public transportation is fine, too, but for your safety, be sure to request a seat, even if they are all occupied. Being jolted around on a train or bus won't hurt your baby, but you are more likely to fall because of the shift in your center of gravity and could injure your abdomen. Long periods of standing can also cause your ankles and feet to swell.

If you're feeling uncomfortable or dizzy, get off the train or bus and sit down in a cooler environment, preferably with your feet up, for about 20 minutes. Always carry water with you when you're out.
