

Your baby will be very cramped in the uterus. It won't be long, however, until she's positioned head down and begins to engage in the pelvis as she prepares to make her entry into the world.

HAIR REMOVAL FOR BIRTH

One dilemma that's rarely discussed—but much pondered—among moms-to-be is whether they should shave or trim their pubic hair before giving birth.

This is a personal choice and depends on your preference for grooming. There is no medical reason to remove your pubic hair, so don't feel pressured to wax or shave—aside from anything else, itchy regrowth will not be welcome in the days following the birth of your baby. If you prefer a more tidy appearance, you can consider trimming, plucking, or shaving any stragglers, though, in the interest of postpartum hygiene. Postpartum blood loss will cling to the hair.

If you're scheduled to have a Cesarean, your obstetrician may ask to shave the top part of your pubic hair if it is going to interfere with your surgical incision, although it's common to leave the hair as is.