

It's a good idea to talk about and work through your grief together before trying to get pregnant again. Miscarrying can be extremely tough and may put a strain on your relationship.

ASK A DOCTOR

I had a miscarriage four weeks ago. Can I try for another baby right away? As a general guide, wait until you've had one period. This will help date the pregnancy if you conceive quickly. However, your doctor may advise waiting longer, especially if your miscarriage was linked with an infection or a known medical problem or was recurrent. It makes sense to have any tests first. You and your partner may also need time to grieve. Rest assured that the vast majority of women who have a single miscarriage go on to have a baby.

There is some recent evidence from a Scottish study that women who conceived again within six months were significantly less likely to have another miscarriage.
