

To finish the Cesarean, the uterus will be closed up with one or two layers of sutures, then the abdominal wall will be stitched in separate layers. This takes about half an hour, although it can take longer, especially if you've had previous surgeries. You may have dissolvable stitches, or stitches that have to be taken out after four or five days; less commonly, small staples may be used. The surgeon usually makes this decision, but if you have preference, make this known to the team caring for you before the surgery starts.

Your baby is gently lifted out of the uterus and the cord is clamped and cut.