

Plants of the world

Golden wattle
Australia

These huge flowers can grow up to 8 in (20 cm) across.

Australian postage stamps have featured its national flower—the fluffy golden wattle.

This 100-yen coin shows cherry blossoms that are celebrated in Japan each year in the spring festival hanami.

Cherry blossom Japan

The blue of this national flower is used on Estonia's flag to represent the country's sea, sky, and lakes.

Cornflower
Estonia

Himalayan blue poppy
Bhutan

This wildflower from Bhutan has distinctive yellow or amber anthers.

Cattleya orchid
Brazil

This colorful flower, also known as the flame lily, belongs to a plant that is protected in Zimbabwe.

Coffee plant
Ethiopia

The arabica coffee plant originates in Ethiopia.

The maple leaf associated with Canada symbolizes unity, peace, and tolerance.

Maple
Canada

This is a wreath of Pakistan's national flower, the sweet-smelling jasmine.

Jasmine Pakistan

Rose of Sharon South Korea

This flower is also known as mugunghwa, which means "eternal blossom that never fades."

Glory lily Zimbabwe

Countries around the world often have a special connection to particular plants, rare or common. Many use flowers or trees as national symbols, often because these plants are culturally or spiritually important to the people living there.

Some countries choose a beautiful local flower to represent their nation, such as the showy cattleya orchids of Brazil and the glory lily of Zimbabwe. Australia observes Wattle Day on September 1 to celebrate the golden wattle that grows