

From grain to bread

Roman bakeries milled their own flour, which they then used to bake bread in huge wood-burning ovens. A large bakery usually housed several mills. Each mill had two giant stones, which ground grain between them. The stones would be turned by a donkey, horse, or human.

This mill would be turned by a donkey, but the animal has been set free.

Keeping a baker's oven hot required a lot of wood.

This man is waiting to see what happens before he decides whether or not to leave.

THE GOD OF FIRE

The ancient Romans had many gods, including Vulcan, the god of fire. The Romans worshipped him in the hope he would stop volcanoes erupting. They held a festival of Vulcan every year on August 23, called the Vulcanalia.

The dog was wearing a studded bronze collar.

Even the finest Roman flour was coarse compared to what we use today.

Final moments

Romans kept dogs as pets as well as for guarding their property. This dog was tied up when Vesuvius erupted. Unable to take his collar off or escape, he died at his post.

