

MAKING WAVES

As waves sweep into coastal water, they are slowed down by the shallow seabed. This causes the crests of the waves to push together, making the waves steeper and steeper. Eventually each wave gets so steep that its crest topples forward in a spectacular breaker. All the energy that built the wave is suddenly released in a cascade of tumbling, crashing white water.