

“Anger has a long history of bringing about positive change.”

CHIMAMANDA NGOZI ADICHIE, FROM THE TEDx TALK
“WE SHOULD ALL BE FEMINISTS,” 2012

MODERN FEMINISM

Nigerian novelist Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie became a feminist icon after her 2012 TEDx Talk went viral, was sampled by pop superstar Beyoncé in 2013, and was adapted into a book-length essay in 2014. “We Should All Be Feminists” both explains the need for feminism and attempts to define what feminism means in the 21st century. The essay also criticizes how society defines masculinity in a narrow way and teaches boys to be “hard men.” Adichie writes that women should embrace the anger they experience at the state of gender relations, and channel it into protest. The female activists pictured (left) are members of the group Women In Black, who channeled their anger when they protested against gender-based violence in Madrid in 2015 by lying down in the streets and playing dead. Men also joined in the protest, which aimed to educate men to stop male chauvinism.
